Before I share everything I've tried, a question: how essential is it that the mcell be next to the wireless router if it is hard wired to it by an Ethernet cord? Having my router in the center of the house provides better service, but having the mcell near a widow is necessary for the GPS. I'm using a long Ethernet cord to accomplish both at once.

@terryk - you have two things going against you for a MicroCell. One is your rural location and two is a mountain between you and the nearest macrocell (tower). Rural locations are sometimes difficult because the GPS coordinates received by AT&T from the MicroCell may not match what's in the locational database for your physical address which results in activation issues. Matching GPS coordinates a
